Excerpt: . . . be excused or held irresponsible for the act done by him while laboring under such temporary insanity, mad-ness or unsoundness of mind thus produced, it being his own voluntary act. But if the mania, insanity or unsoundness of mind, though produced by drunkenness, be permanent and fixed, so as to destroy all knowledge of right and wrong, then the person thus laboring under these infirmities would not be responsible. 2. Where a request to charge was fully covered by the general charge given, it was not necessary for the court to charge such request. 3. Where the defendant shot two persons at the same time, upon his trial for the murder of one of them, it was not admissible to show that the other stated to a third person a short time after the shooting, that the defendant did the killing, but would not have done it if he had been in his right mind. Such a statement was immaterial and was not a statement of fact constituting a part of the res gestae, but was a mere expression of opinion. 4. There was no error in refusing to admit testimony that, prior to the homicide, when the defendant purchased a bottle of whiskey, he said he was going to quit, and that was the last drop he ever expected to drink. Such testimony was immaterial. 5. Where the court, in opening his charge to the jury, stated that...
