This bacillus is motile, flagellated (possessing hair-like processes), grows best in bouillon or milk, is very resistant to cold, being able to live for three months in ice, is usually killed by a temperature of 60 C. (140 F.), is always present in the stools, and usually in the urine. Modes of infection: 1. Direct. By contact with the stools or urine containing typhoid bacilli. The hands becoming contaminated, bacilli are easily taken into the mouth, and so into the intestinal canal. Carelessness with bedclothes, bedpans, urinals, or any articles or utensils coming in con tact with the excreta of the patient may very easily cause attendants to acquire the disease. 2. Water. This is by far the most common source of all typhoid epidemics. If the water supply of a community is infected, practically every one not immune to the disease is taken ill. Carelessness in disinfection and disposal of excreta, or an inadequately protected watershed, pave the way for an infected water supply. The accompanying diagram illustrates schematically how a water supply may become infected. ii Fig. 7. --Diagram to illustrate Water supply of town. 1, town; 2, water reservoir; 3, house with typhoid patient--no care taken to disinfect stools; 4, spot where stools and urine are emptied; 5, arrows showing hillside down which bacilli are washed by rain, until infected rain-water reaches reservoir which in turn becomes polluted; 6, pipe running from reservoir to town. While the...
